Background/Issues & Analysis

In 1994, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) developed a nationwide prevention strategy to improve the public health system, its program design and infrastructure, to effectively detect and prevent emerging infectious diseases. This was in response to an influential report published in 1992 entitled 'Emerging Infections: Microbial Threats to Health in the United States' by the National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine (IOM). The report was critical in raising awareness of infectious diseases in the U.S. as much of the conventional wisdom of the day was that infectious diseases were all but defeated domestically after the development of antibiotics, vaccines, and improved sanitation.

Since the establishment of the Epidemiology and Laboratory Capacity (ELC), infectious diseases have continued to threaten the nation. During the years since ELC was initiated, the United States experienced outbreaks related to coccidioidomycosis, waterborne Cryptosporidium, drug-resistant Streptococcus pneumoniae, Escherichia coli O157:H7, and Hantavirus Pulmonary Syndrome. Furthermore, a 2012 IOM review of the two decades since the original IOM report by the National Academy of Sciences noted that previously unrecognized infectious diseases have continued to emerge and highlighted West Nile virus, Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA), Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS), and H1N1 Influenza, as generating a renewed need in improving public health surveillance, laboratory detection, and response. Finally, cementing the case for continued vigilance against infectious disease are the high-profile 2014/2015 Ebola Virus and 2015/2016 Zika virus outbreaks. The burden of infectious diseases was then, and still remains, a major public health threat to society and the health care system.

The purpose of the ELC Cooperative Agreement (and therefore this continuation guidance) is to protect the public health and safety of the American people by enhancing the capacity of public health agencies to effectively detect, respond, prevent and control known and emerging (or re-emerging) infectious diseases.
